Nicholas Mirzoeff : The Right to Look: A Counterhistory of Visuality before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised The Right to Look: A Counterhistory of Visuality:

0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. Good insights on Francisco Oller By GotAwkward I bought this book specifically because I needed info about Francisco Oller for a paper I was writing. The book had very good insights about his painting "El Velorio". I am trying to downsize my library since my books take up too much space so I might sell it back and get the kindle version, because I still want to read the rest of it.

In The Right to Look, Nicholas Mirzoeff develops a comparative decolonial framework for visual culture studies, the field that he helped to create and shape. Casting modernity as an ongoing contest between visibility and counter-visibility, or "the right to look," he explains how visibility sutures authority to power and renders the association natural. An early-nineteenth-century concept, meaning the visualization of history, visibility has been central to the legitimization of Western hegemony. Mirzoeff identifies three "complexes of visibility"—plantation slavery, imperialism, and the present-day military-industrial complex—and explains how, within each, power is made to seem self-evident through techniques of classification, separation, and aestheticization. At the same time, he shows how each complex of visibility has been countered—by the enslaved, the colonized, and opponents of war, all of whom assert autonomy from authority by claiming the right to look. Encompassing the Caribbean plantation and the Haitian revolution, anticolonialism in the South Pacific, antifascism in Italy and Algeria, and the contemporary global counterinsurgency, The Right to Look is a work of astonishing geographic, temporal, and conceptual reach.

"[V]isual studies will no longer be the same before and after this book. . . . Mirzoeff's work does it all: offering new perspectives, blurring the boundaries between disciplines, disclosing what had been hidden, and shooting trouble." - Jan Baetens, Leonardo
